HIS COLORS. adawa the advancing Proa ditch half filled with dead Austrians. Among them was a lying upon his back, mortally wounded. Her with compassion, the victors wished to move him, and have a surgeon attend to his wounds, but he begged them to let him be where he was, as he felt quite cool and comfort 2 bla. In a short time he died. Upon removing his body they found, folded beneath him, the "bit of rag" which through that bloody day had been the standard of his regiment. They fore ore to selze the trophy, but wrapped it around his body and laid him to rest-] Sadowa's fatal field was fought: Onward the Prussians poured Exultant, proud—for through the day, Though fierce had been the direful fray. Their flag triumphant seared.

Wild shouts of victory rang out From lips with battle stirred; And many a face grew dark with pain. And many a face wound throbbed again. When these wild shouts were heard.

The conquering logious panset upon
The field so lately won—
And where the Austrian thousands stood,
The dead and dying bathed in blood,
Lay stretched beneath the sun.

And there amid those dying men. Uttering no grean or cry, Vas one, who through the fatal stylle, is though he bore a charmed life. Itad waved his colors high.

But stricken now, and pale he lay, His broken flag-staff near: Formsken, lone, life fleeling last; Tellen! The lond, triumphant bugle blast Prussia in his ear. No mother ever kissed a cheek More manly armore fair; Ills fading eyes he gently closed,

A smile upon his lips reposed, Those lips were moved in prayer. So beautiful, so brave, so young.

There on the field be lay:
His victors strive to staunch his wound:
They strive to lift him from the ground:

le walves them all away. "Leave me," he cried, "I ask no sid; Death's damp is on my brow, ere in the green earth let me lie, ere in the sunset shadows die-

Oh! I am happy now."; And so death came—and gathering round, With manly, tender care, They raise him from his gory bed, And lifting up his youthful head, They smoothed hiselotted hair.

And there, beneath him, folded, lay.
All bloody, smaked, and torn.
The remnant of that banner bright
That, through the thickest of the fight,
His hand had nobly borns ! Those stalwart men brushed tender tears

From eyes unused to wonp: They wrapped the sing about his breast And selfly left him to his rest, In clery's sweetest sleep! ANOTHER ENCYCERCAL FORTH-COMING. Home Correspondent Pall Mall Gazette
